We arrived at night in the aqua room
that had beckoned us in from the drizzle.

Wearing my street clothes, I watched from the side while she in her swim suit, immersing toes first, demurred.
At the opposite end of the pool, submerged-
a huge black and white killer whale.
Painted true-to-life, it seemed to sway
and swell authentically in rhythm with the swimmers.

How afraid my daughter was: she didn't dare go in.

She only tempted danger, flirting-dipping skittish toes and giggling.

Big eyes batting long dark lashes, far away from peril.